Some of Edward Said’s most personal writing involves his memories of a music-filled youth in Cairo, with a focus on the European classical tradition. He returned to this “west-east” dialogue as a co-founder of the West-Eastern Divan Orchestra. These engagements and their leading tropes of memory, exile, and contrapuntality suggest structures and arguments that are somewhat different from earlier paradigms of postcoloniality and orientalism.